

Excerpt from Self-Education: Or the Means and Art of Moral Progress
The translator of Self-Education, in presenting the second edition to the public, feels able to say that it is more worthy of perusal than before, the translation having been a good deal revised, and the numerous misprints of the first edition, corrected. It is perhaps due to the translators own taste, however, to say, that the peculiar, proverbial style of the original makes it impossible to give it a flowing style in English. It will be observed, that the few chapters, containing the metaphysical views, which constituted the First Book in the other edition, have been omitted in this. It is intended to retranslate these, in a much more free manner, and publish them separately, at some future time. They were omitted, in this book, because it was found that their metaphysical character created a prejudice in the minds of many persons; and thus cut off the class of readers to whom the practical part would be most interesting and useful. These chapters will be published in such a form as to be adapted for the higher classes in schools; and will, of course, be accessible to any, whose interest in the Authors metaphysical views may be excited by an acquaintance with his beautiful ethics.
